Giving you firm foundations to build your future

Era of rapid change makes financial experts invaluable

From tax increases to global instability, Britons are finding plenty to feel unsettled about – in this environment, taking control of your money is more vital than ever

David Prosser

It's almost the new tax year, but the same financial challenges remain – and then some. Not least, the cost-of-living crisis continues to bite, with inflation remaining stubbornly high and essentials such as food and energy particularly expensive. Almost half of Britons saw their household finances deteriorate last year, according to research from

YouGov, with fewer than one in ten noting an improvement. Britons are also getting to grips with a string of changes announced in the budgets the government has unveiled over the past 18 months. These have included extending the freeze on income tax thresholds, increases in taxes on many savings and investments, and reforms of pensions taxation. Add in the uncertainties of the broader economic outlook, as the world tries to second-guess what the US president, Donald Trump, might say or do next, and it's not hard to explain why so many Britons feel anxious. More than half are worried about their current financial situation, recent research from Ipsos reveals. Against this backdrop, high-quality financial advice has never been more valuable. Well-qualified and expert financial advisers can provide their clients with a roadmap through current crises – along with important reassurance that they are handling their finances in the right way.

“Advisers play a vital role in helping individuals navigate their personal circumstances, as well as an increasingly complex savings and investment landscape. This empowers them to make the most of what they have,” says Heather Christie, head of UK adviser and platform sales at asset management firm BlackRock. Importantly, there doesn't have to be a specific trigger for seeking out a financial adviser for the first time. Often, people don't get round to seeing an adviser until they have a specific need – following a change in job, for example, when they've had children or when a particular fiscal challenge presents itself. But financial advice has benefits at any time, says Jessica Cook, a chartered financial planner who runs her own company. “An adviser can bring structure and perspective,” she says. “Many people have finances spread across different policies and investments but no clear strategy. Advice helps organise what is already there, set priorities and align money with timescales and goals. It can also show how today's decisions may play out over time, helping people to understand whether they are on track and where they may need to make adjustments.” The goal should be to build a close working relationship with an adviser who can help you achieve your financial ambitions and leave you feeling more confident about the choices you're making. “Big financial decisions are emotional,” says Cook. “Markets fall, headlines unsettle people and life rarely goes to plan. But a financial adviser acts as an objective sounding board, helping people avoid costly kneejerk reactions while also giving them confidence to act when it matters.”

An adviser is an objective sounding board, helping people avoid kneejerk reactions

Financial advisers point out that no two clients are the same. Everyone has different life goals and priorities – and everyone's current circumstances vary. The adviser's role is therefore to find out what matters most to each client and then to help them get to where they want to be from where they are today. Some people may already have made a start with savings and investments, or enjoy an income that leaves spare cash to put towards future goals. But advisers also work with many clients whose financial position today is more challenging – and potentially includes borrowing that needs to be dealt with. Their role is to help each client develop a financial plan that's appropriate and realistic for them. “We know that financial advice makes a difference – and, in particular, to those who are less well off,” adds BlackRock's Christie. “A recent survey by the International Longevity Centre found that those taking advice can be anywhere from 11 per cent to 60 per cent better off compared with those who do not.” In most cases, the plan will evolve over time. Financial advisers work with their clients on an ongoing basis, checking in regularly to assess their progress and to find out what may have changed in people's lives. Getting regular support with your finances – even in the form of a quick financial health check – can help you stay on track and provide critical reassurance. Equally, while financial advisers will discuss products that might help you achieve your goals – tax-efficient plans, such as individual savings accounts (ISAs) and private pensions, perhaps – it's important to see these as a means to an end. Advisers may recommend certain products but they will also suggest other courses of action, which could include changes to your financial behaviour or more effective tax planning, that will help you make progress. The key is to have an expert in your corner – a specialist with the expertise to help you put your finances on the right course, to keep you on track and to take away the financial anxiety that so many people currently feel.

adviser Rowley Turton, based in Leicester. “The client should be happy to explain their situation, what their concerns are and what they are looking to achieve or need help with. The adviser should explain how they work, any restrictions that apply and the costs of advice.” Once you've decided to go ahead, your adviser will conduct a fact find, aimed at really understanding where you currently stand. They may want to take some time to carry out research into your existing financial commitments – any terms and conditions they should be aware of, for example – before coming up with a detailed way forward. “That's followed by a meeting to discuss the recommendations, and sometimes a subsequent meeting to agree on and implement the next steps,” Turton adds.

Advisers work hard to give you as much information as possible. This can include forecasts of your future income and spending needs, as well as examples of different scenarios you might work towards. Their job isn't to tell you what to do; rather, it is to help you make the best choices given your priorities. Think about how you want to work with your adviser on an ongoing basis. Some people prefer face-to-face meetings – whether in person or online – but phone consultations can work too. Advisers' use of technology can be important. Many now make the most of digital resources to keep you in the picture and help you make informed decisions. That can bring everything together, so you get a full view of all your finances in one place.

REALITY CHECK ON THE LIMITS OF AI

Artificial intelligence is a potentially useful tool in financial advice, but can an algorithm replicate personal connection and emotional intelligence?

Leah Milner

Like it or loathe it, artificial intelligence is becoming a prominent player in our everyday lives. From customer service chatbots to AI summaries at the top of Google searches, it is difficult to avoid whenever you venture online. Used wisely, AI can boost productivity by tackling boring tasks quickly, saving you time and effort. When it comes to finance, it can help you draw up a budget, explain complex investment jargon and even suggest how to build a portfolio. A natural extension of all this might be to think that your new AI assistant can replace a financial adviser completely. But there are huge risks in typing sensitive personal information into tools if it is not clear how that data is going to be used or whether it is safely stored. On top of this, the answers AI provides are not always correct, as experts frequently warn. “AI has been known to hallucinate or to take data that is not true because it has used an unreliable source,” says Sharad Champaneria, an independent financial adviser at Accomplished Financial Solutions, based in Leicester. When you deal with a regulated financial adviser, there are many layers of protection and accountability. They have to adhere to strict regulations to ensure their advice is suitable, and they must hold insurance cover in case they make any professional errors. They must be properly qualified and the advice they provide is covered by the Financial Services Compensation Scheme. This means that, even if the company goes bust, you can still make

Most of the job is talking – not just about money, but what's going on in clients' lives too a claim for compensation if you were given inappropriate guidance. “Clients want to know who they are dealing with, who is responsible for the advice and to be able to pick up the phone to someone when they need to,” says Champaneria. With AI, he warns, it can be difficult to spot when it has made a mistake. “If you do encounter problems, you are not going to have any recourse because there is no one to sue.” Chatbots might sound reassuringly human, but real emotional intelligence is difficult to replicate. “Financial advice is about behaviour and psychology, not simply about numbers,” says Jyles Allen, a Bristol-based financial planning consultant at Quilter. “Even if someone is very clued up about investment, emotions can still cloud their judgement.” Champaneria agrees. When the stock markets plummeted during the pandemic, he provided his clients with reassurance to stop them from cashing out of their investments at the worst possible time in the cycle. “A lot of my conversations around that time were just saying, ‘Hold tight, we'll get through this,’” he says. “Very quickly markets recovered and went higher.” That does not mean advisers are resisting the advance of technology. Both Allen and Champaneria believe AI can be used to improve the quality of advice by reducing their administrative tasks and freeing up time for deeper conversations with clients. However, tools must be secure and properly vetted. “AI is fantastic if it can take away all the things that make processes long and complicated,” says Allen. Champaneria agrees, adding that transcription software allows advisers to focus fully on what clients are saying rather than on note-taking and paperwork. “Most of my job is talking to clients, not just about money, but about everything that is going on in their lives,” says Champaneria. That trusted relationship developed over time gives clients peace of mind that their finances are in good hands, he says. Allen agrees – an algorithm is no substitute for that kind of partnership. “AI can complement good advice but not replace it,” he says. “The whole point of a financial planner is to go alongside you on that journey, to get to know your family, your hopes for the future and what you need to protect.”

Face to face: for now, at least, AI looks like being a complement to human planning

WHAT HAPPENS WHEN YOU MEET AN ADVISER?

The early chats you'll have when seeking fiscal guidance are as much about building a relationship as crunching numbers

For anyone who's never consulted a financial expert, the first appointment can sometimes feel daunting. But advisers are at pains to put new clients at ease – their job is to get to know you and to understand your current position, so they can identify the best ways to help you work towards the goals in your life that require some financial planning. Spend some time in advance of your first meeting thinking about what help you need and pulling together as many details of your current finances as you can provide – from any debts you have to the savings and investments you may hold. But also remember that you're starting a relationship here and that it's important to feel comfortable with your adviser. You may even want to talk to two or three before deciding which one to go with. “The initial meeting is generally about the adviser and client getting to know each other,” explains Scott Turton, a director of financial

Plan now to pass on more

Pension savings will fall further under the remit of inheritance tax from next year. Here’s how to reduce your liability

David Prosser

Financial advisers report a surge in inquiries from families worried about how to protect private pension savings from inheritance tax (IHT). That reflects the government’s plans for a major shake-up of the IHT rules on pension cash, which take effect from 2027 and could result in big bills for many families. Currently, most savings held in private pension funds – built up at work or through individual arrangements – can be passed on to children with no IHT to worry about. Any savings remaining in your pensions when you die will fall outside the value of your estate for IHT purposes. From April 2027, however, pension savings will fall within the IHT net. If your remaining pension cash, plus the value of the rest of your estate, exceeds the IHT threshold – £325,000, or £500,000 including the value of your home – your beneficiaries will owe IHT on the excess. IHT is usually payable at 40 per cent, so the bill could be substantial. If you’re right up to the threshold and you pass pension assets of £250,000 to your heirs, for example, they would owe £100,000 to the taxman. And IHT bills must normally be paid within six months of death, leaving families with the headache of liquidating pension scheme investments quickly to settle what they are left owing. “People feeling this most acutely are the ‘accidental millionaires’,” says Daren Wallbank, co-founder and lead adviser at London-based Ginkgo Financial. “There are couples who have done nothing flashy, but find themselves sitting on a family home worth £800,000 and pension pots they’ve diligently built over decades.” However, it’s not all bad news. Private pensions remain highly tax efficient – when you’re building up savings and when you’re making withdrawals. Your children may also be able to set income tax payments due on inherited pension assets against the IHT bill. Moreover, points out Wallbank, a good financial adviser will help you plan ahead to mitigate IHT risk. The key is not to leave it until the last minute. “The ideal time for planning is in your fifties or sixties, when you have clarity about what you need to live on, confidence you won’t outlive your money and the runway to make meaningful gifts,” he says. “Leave it until your eighties and the options narrow drastically.” The simplest way to tackle a potential IHT liability is to reduce the value of your estate. You can do that by giving away wealth: making gifts of up to £3,000 a year with no tax implications at all, and further gifts that will fall out of your estate for IHT purposes as long as you survive for seven years after making them. You can also make “gifts out of income” of any size, if you can show your income consistently exceeds your needs. “For couples who own property jointly, we often look at something called ‘tenants in common,’” adds Wallbank. “Instead of owning the whole house together, you each own half; on the first death, that half can pass to the children while the surviving spouse keeps living there, which uses up one person’s allowances sooner and takes future growth out of the estate.” Another option might be a life insurance policy, written in trust. You could buy cover that pays out on your death, providing your inheritors with a windfall to help settle some or all of the IHT due. “Something else that clients often seem to overlook is that the interspousal transfer remains in place,” says Chris Hulse, group head of customer voice and marketing at UK-wide financial advice network Amber River. “A spouse can still inherit a pension free of IHT,” he explains. “Subject to the age of the spouse on death, the inherited fund may also be free of income tax, opening up some planning opportunities.” Still, all IHT planning needs to be approached carefully – the rules are complex and it’s easy to fall into traps such as making ineligible gifts. That’s why good financial advice is so valuable in this area. Importantly, an adviser will help you to look at IHT planning in the round, rather than thinking only about how your pension assets affect your family’s position. One question to consider is how to run down your savings in retirement if they’re spread across a mixture of pension schemes, ISAs, bank and building society deposits, and other assets. In the past, advisers would have suggested taking money out of non-pension assets first, leaving the IHT-free pensions for later on and preserving their value. Now that approach may need to change. “For some clients, it might be that starting to draw on their pension from 2027 makes sense, and they use their other assets for IHT planning,” says Hulse. Advisers can also help you explore other tax-efficient investments that come with IHT benefits. For example, shares in the Enterprise Investment Scheme (EIS) may be exempt from IHT once you’ve held them for two years. But this is a risky type of investment, offering exposure to early-stage small businesses, so it makes sense to take expert advice on whether the EIS is suitable for you.

‘THIS CAN HAVE A MASSIVE IMPACT’

Inheritance rules are set to become even more complex – and the cost of doing nothing could run to hundreds of thousands. But one adviser has found ways to stay ahead of the game

Next year pensions will undergo a major change, and advisers are preparing their clients early to avoid a substantial tax hit. Until now, pensions were often used in legacy planning as a way for families to pass on savings tax-free to their beneficiaries, but this avenue is closing. From April 2027, most unused pension funds will form part of an individual’s estate for inheritance tax (IHT) purposes, meaning a potential 40 per cent charge. Financial advisers such as Seán Standerwick of MLP Wealth in Banstead, Surrey, are making sure their clients are prepared for this shift. He says: “I’m discussing this with a lot of my clients as it can have a massive impact.” But with some careful planning, Standerwick says he is able to help clients make use of other reliefs so they can still pass on as much of their wealth as possible to their loved ones rather than the taxman. Pension tax rules are complex and it can be difficult to understand whether or not you are affected by the reforms. Those with final salary or defined benefit pensions, which pay out a set amount per year over the course of retirement, are not impacted by the rule change because they would not usually be able to pass on their pension at death – although a spouse or dependent child might continue to receive a proportion of their income. The same applies to any pension that has been converted into an annuity to provide an income for life. However, any pension pot left over after buying an annuity will be in scope for death duties from next April. Most families will not be liable for IHT even after the changes, but the government’s forecasts suggest that, in the first year following the reforms, 38,500 estates will pay more than they would have done under previous rules. It says the average IHT liability is expected to increase by around £34,000 when pension assets are included. However, the cost of doing nothing could run to hundreds of thousands of pounds in the worst examples, warns Standerwick. A couple with a combined pension pot of £1.2 million, a house worth £950,000 and ISA investments worth £208,000, would see their IHT bill jump by £563,600 overnight, from £63,200 to £626,800. Standerwick is using a variety of planning tools to help his clients safeguard their savings for their children and grandchildren. One such strategy takes advantage of business relief, which allows up to 100 per cent of a company’s assets to be passed on to successors without paying IHT. It is designed to help businesses continue trading after the death of one of the owners. Standerwick has helped several clients find appropriate investments, so they can use this relief as part of their inheritance planning. He says: “In cases like these, we can show that by putting in place the right structure for their investments at the outset, we can save clients thousands of pounds in taxes further down the line.”

Keys to a comfortable retirement? It depends

Start saving early is the normal theory – but as these money experts explain, there’s no single right answer as everyone’s different

David Prosser

How much should you be saving for retirement? It’s one of the questions that financial advisers are asked all the time. The automatic enrolment system – requiring employers to offer all staff a pension scheme and to contribute on their behalf – could provide a good starting point. The minimum contribution under auto-enrolment is 8 per cent of earnings, split between employees, employers and the tax relief provided by the government. However, Pensions UK, the pensions industry body, says 12 per cent is a better target to aim for to achieve a comfortable retirement. The longer you leave it to start saving, the more you’ll need to pay in, warns Scott Gallacher, a director of Leicester-based financial adviser Rowley Turton. “Saving earlier is better because it gives your money more time to grow – starting your pension contributions as soon as you begin work is ideal, though people also have other priorities, and those matter too,” he says. “For many people, the real push comes in their fifties when earnings are often higher, mortgages may be nearly paid off, and children are becoming more independent. That’s usually when people need to maximise contributions – and when they realise that leaving it too late makes things much harder.” To underline the point, a 25-year-old paying in £300 each month could expect to build a pension pot worth between £500,000 and £700,000 by the time they’re 67, assuming annual investment returns of 4–6 per cent. If you don’t start saving until you’re 35, you would need to contribute almost twice as much each month to achieve the same amount, while a 50-year-old would need to find monthly contributions of about £2,000. In practice, most people find events get in the way of saving consistently throughout their working lives. Jessica Cook, a chartered financial planner who runs her own financial advice firm, says advisers work to general principles, but adapt these to the specific needs of each client. “As a broad illustration, many planning frameworks work on

For many, the real push comes in their fifties – that’s when they must maximise contributions total pension contributions, including from the employer, of around 8–10 per cent of your income in your early career, rising towards 12–15 per cent or more in mid to late-career where affordable,” says Cook. “For some people – particularly those starting work later, that have career gaps or are aiming to retire earlier – higher rates may be needed.” The short answer to the question that every financial adviser is asked? There’s no single right response – because every client is different. That’s why personalised advice from a professional is so valuable.

How can we close gender wealth gap?

With first-hand insight into our financial journeys, female advisers are driving results

Holly Thomas

A woman’s financial journey is different to that of a man’s. Department for Work and Pensions data shows that, on average, women earn less and have smaller pensions, so they face a greater challenge to become financially resilient.

However, by seeking professional advice about growing their wealth, as well as inheritance planning and tax matters, women can take control of their financial future, says Rakhee Wood at Butterfly Financial Planning.

“There’s still a legacy in the UK of traditional gender roles in the household, with finances falling into the man’s remit,” she explains. “But women are living longer than men, and the likelihood is that household finances will be, at some point in their lives, their sole responsibility. If this is later in life, it can be stressful and, without the right help, leave them exposed to making poor decisions.”

While a large proportion of women want to take control of money matters, research from the Financial Services Compensation Scheme – the government safety net for when authorised financial firms fail – showed that women are less likely than men to seek professional advice.

More women today are becoming financially independent than in previous generations, particularly with the current high level of employment. The proportion of women in work was 71.8 per cent in 2024, according to the latest data from the Office for National Statistics – up from 55.5 per cent in the early Seventies.

Getting professional help will prove crucial for beneficiaries of the “great wealth transfer”, with up to £7 trillion expected to be passed from baby boomers to their offspring over the next 30 years.

A huge amount of assets could be transferred into the hands of women in the coming decades, making timely financial planning all the more critical.

THE RIGHT TIME TO START

Women climbing the career ladder and wanting long-term confidence would benefit from setting sound planning habits early. Wood says: “Our youngest client is 28 and a highly aspirational entrepreneur who wants to start off with the right foundations. It’s great to seek advice as soon as possible, yet most people do so when there’s a change that requires planning: they want to work less or switch career, or their personal circumstances change, such as a divorce or inheritance.”

Women often need to account for career breaks when planning ahead. Many also find themselves with caregiving responsibilities for ageing parents, while still supporting grown-up children and potentially grandchildren. For this so-called sandwich generation, the need to put a robust plan in place is even

It pays to set out a financial strategy early greater. The prospect of retirement can add another layer of anxiety, but it’s also an opportunity to thrive if money concerns are alleviated, notes financial planner Jessica Cook.

“Longevity makes it even more important for women to seek advice,” she says. “Women are more exposed to the risk of outliving their assets, and many will have long, active years beyond traditional retirement. Financial plans increasingly need to accommodate personal reinvention as well as security. For many women, later life is not a wind-down but a new phase of independence.”

TRUST IS KEY

When choosing an adviser, trust, communication and representation are important factors. VouchedFor data shows female clients tend to build stronger relationships with female advisers. They typically speak with them more frequently, feel more comfortable making contact outside scheduled meetings, and are more open about discussing personal challenges and life changes.

Long-term advice relationships can be valuable for women because their financial lives often follow a unique rhythm, Cook says.

“Earning patterns, career trajectories and financial responsibilities do not always move in straight lines,” she explains.

“And the points where money decisions matter most are often tied to major life changes, such as a woman returning to work in her forties, worried she has fallen behind on her pension, or perhaps a business owner after selling up, suddenly responsible for investing substantial proceeds.”

Cook believes continuity is more effective than seeking advice only

Longevity makes it important to seek advice – there’s the risk of outliving your assets for one-off transactions. “It also removes some of the mental weight,” she adds.

“Decisions do not have to be faced alone and financial questions do not become another quiet source of stress. At its best, long-term advice gives women more than a financial plan. It gives them clarity, reassurance and the confidence that comes from feeling in control of their financial future.”

One barrier is women feeling that they don’t have enough money to start off with. Research from Fidelity International, a global investment management company, found more than one in three women felt they didn’t have enough wealth to warrant speaking to a financial adviser.

“The purpose of financial advice is to grow wealth from any starting point,” Wood says. “You don’t need to be wealthy to seek advice.

“As the end of the tax year approaches and with taxes in the UK at an all-time high, there’s no better time to get your money matters looked at to make sure you’re being as tax-efficient as possible.

“With the help of an adviser, women can build their wealth and improve their financial security for the future.”

Time to take stock

A job change and a landmark birthday led Jo to seek financial advice – and realise that she had never really thought about the lifestyle she wanted in retirement

Jo Chetwynd decided to get financial advice when she reached milestones in both her career and her life.

Jo, who lives in the East Midlands, left an employer she had been with for 30 years, just as she was approaching her 50th birthday.

“It felt like a pivotal moment had arrived and I realised I had never really taken stock of what I have, what I might need in the future and what tax-efficient measures there might be that I’m not taking advantage of,” says Jo, who is head of commercial for her current employer.

“I’ve always been reasonably sensible about finances, but it’s by no means my area of expertise. I decided it was right to finally invest some time in getting my money matters in order.”

Jo – who is married to Paul and has two children, Isabel, 23, and Oliver, 21 – followed a recommendation from a trusted colleague and approached a female adviser in her area to see how she might be able to help.

“Finding the right person was really important to me. I needed to feel comfortable being in front of someone and openly discussing my financial affairs and my plans for the future. Fortunately I found the right person straight away and we hit it off.”

She sought advice from Jessica Cook, who was able to structure investments for her as well as providing advice on tax and estate planning.

“Jessica was great,” says Jo. “After an initial chat I had some work to do in rounding up my affairs, which included what I have in terms of assets and my outgoings. It took time to complete this but it was a worthwhile exercise going through everything.

“Once it was all laid bare for Jessica to see, the things we discussed – including priorities for the future and the kind of lifestyle I would like in retirement – got me really thinking about these things for the first time.”

One thing Jo highlighted was that, apart from maternity leave, she has always worked full-time, even once she had children.

“Part-time wasn’t an option for my type of role when the kids came along. So I wanted to make sure that I was investing for growth to give me options when it comes to retirement. There’s so much talk about having to work longer and longer, I wanted to know where I stand.”

Having been through the advice process, Jo now says she has the confidence and comfort that at some stage in the future she will be able to stop work and be comfortable.

“I also know that my money is working hard. I have an annual review, but I can speak to my adviser any time to ask questions or review a new situation should one arise.

“I’m so glad I got in touch with Jessica after a few years of procrastinating about getting professional financial advice.”

MAKING CASH WORK

Savings offer security but too much sitting idle can erode wealth – it’s best to strike a balance

Holly Thomas

Reliable returns, a valuable safety net... a mixture of both? How you value holding cash in the bank often depends on what stage of life you’re at and the amount of risk you’re prepared to take.

It’s commonly accepted that a cash savings buffer is a cornerstone of any financial plan, giving peace of mind and financial resilience against unexpected expenses and life events.

What if you lost your job or fell ill and your income dried up? Redundancy payouts or insurance might make up the shortfall for a while, but being forced to sell assets – such as investments or property – rather than choosing to do so might mean maintaining cashflow at the expense of future gains.

What does a good cash buffer look like? The rule of thumb is to have enough in an easy access account for three to six months’ worth of essential expenditure.

This should at minimum cover rent or mortgage payments as well as household bills, but ideally other living costs too.

UK banking offers the security that your deposits are protected, thanks to the Financial Services Compensation Scheme. This guarantees reimbursement of up to £120,000 per person (£240,000 for joint accounts) per institution if a provider goes bust.

But having too much in savings carries risks. Cash may be less volatile than the stock market, but any returns – the interest on your deposits – must outpace inflation, otherwise your true spending power erodes over time.

Barclays’ latest Equity Gilt Study compares returns on various assets and shows that over longer periods shares have significantly outperformed cash. According to the report, US shares delivered returns of 6.8 per cent a year on average over the past 50 years, while UK stocks paid 5.4 per cent. Cash yielded just 0.7 per cent.

That said, cash still has its place and remains valuable at specific times, which is where advisers can help, as Malcolm Steel from the financial advice firm Mearns & Company explains.

“Holding large amounts of cash is important for cautious clients with shorter-term goals,” he says.

“But those looking at the longer term need to think about higher levels of risk to mitigate inflation and to access the potential of higher growth, especially when it comes to putting money away for your retirement.

“Advisers can help balance certainty with growth by working out the right mix of cash and investments for your circumstances.”

WHY KEEP A SAVINGS BUFFER?

- Emergency fund Cash is instantly accessible in the event of redundancy, illness or unexpected bills, and may mean you don’t need to sell investments at a bad time.
- House deposit If you need to use the money within a couple of years, cash protects against market swings before an investment is drawn down.
- Uncertain or irregular income Cash provides flexibility and stability if your earnings fluctuate, helping to cover costs during quieter periods.
- Approaching retirement Holding more cash can help to cover day-to-day spending in the first years of retirement, so you’re not forced to sell investments if markets fall just as you stop working.
- Receiving a lump sum Keeping the money in cash initially gives you breathing space to plan, rather than rushing into investment decisions.

CHART A PATH: FEES TO EXPECT

The cost of financial advice varies across the industry – and according to the product or service – so it’s important to research and crunch the numbers before you commit

Uncertainty over costs should not be a barrier to seeking financial advice. Before a financial adviser goes ahead with any work, they must be clear and upfront about their charges. This means you should feel comfortable that you understand exactly what you are paying and what you are getting in return.

There are different pricing structures across the industry. A recent industry survey by consultancy NextWealth found that around 70 per cent of financial advisers charge fees based on a percentage of a client’s assets. Fixed fees are the second most common structure, used regularly by 29 per cent of advisers.

All fees are typically split into an upfront charge for getting a financial plan set up, followed by an ongoing charge for advice and managing money.

For pensions and investments, initial advice costs between 1 and 3 per cent of the amount being invested, with ongoing advice charged at around 0.5 to 1 per cent a year, according to MoneyHelper, a free guidance service backed by the government.

On a £100,000 portfolio, that could mean an upfront fee of £1,000 to £3,000, followed by £500 to £1,000 a year for reviews, adjustments and long-term planning. Other advisers may charge a fixed fee or an hourly rate, particularly for more focused or one-off pieces of work, according to MoneyHelper. Fees for financial advice typically range from £100 to £350 an hour.

Mortgage advice is generally cheaper than far-reaching advice that covers every aspect of your finances. Some mortgage brokers charge a fee of between £300 and £1,000, or a percentage of the loan amount. Others do not charge the borrower a fee at all as they rely solely on commission from the lender.

Advice on life insurance, critical illness cover or income protection is usually paid for via commission, meaning there is no upfront cost. Equity release advice is more complex and typically costs between £500 and £2,000.

Matthew Walne, a chartered wealth planner and managing director of Santorini Financial Planning in Rothley, near Loughborough, says: “You should always be given a breakdown of how you will be charged and what each stage covers. If anything isn’t clear, don’t be afraid to ask.”

Jamie Pearson, partner and financial adviser at London-based Westminster Wealth Management, agrees: “Clients should know exactly what they are paying for, and why.”

TYPE OF FINANCIAL ADVICE	HOW FEES ARE USUALLY CHARGED	TYPICAL UPFRONT COST	TYPICAL ONGOING COST	NOTES
PENSIONS & INVESTMENTS	Percentage of assets, fixed fee or hourly rate	1-3% of amount invested	0.5-1% a year	Covers setting up a financial plan, investment selection and reviews. Some advisers may instead charge fixed or hourly fees.
ONE-OFF OR FOCUSED ADVICE (eg retirement planning, investment review)	Fixed fee or hourly rate	Varies by scope	None	Rates typically range from £100 to £350 an hour. Suitable for targeted advice rather than ongoing management.
MORTGAGE ADVICE	Fixed fee, percentage of loan, or commission	£300-£1,000, or sometimes £0	None	Some brokers do not charge the borrower directly, instead relying on lender commission.
PROTECTION ADVICE (life insurance, critical illness, income protection)	Commission from provider	£0	None	The adviser is usually paid by the insurer, meaning no direct upfront cost to the client.
EQUITY RELEASE ADVICE	Fixed fee	£500-£2,000	None	Typically more complex and regulated, reflecting the higher cost.

Good for the planet – and the pocket

Ethical investing aims to align your finances with your values – so what does it look like in practice, and how do the returns stack up?

Holly Thomas

The next generation of investors are more environmentally and ethically conscious than ever before. A report last April by Morgan Stanley found that, while 88 per cent of all investors express interest in sustainable investing, that rises to 97 per cent for millennials and 99 per cent for Gen Z.

But how do you know when you’re investing environmentally and ethically – and can the returns match, or even beat, investments that are less picky about where your money goes?

ESG investing focuses on purchasing shares in companies that are managed according to sound ethical principles.

The E stands for environment, meaning a business needs strong credentials in cleaner energy, more sustainable transport or reducing plastic waste, for example.

S is for social, focusing on a company’s treatment of staff and suppliers, and to what extent it upholds labour and human rights.

The G relates to governance, which includes ensuring fair leadership of the business, matters of executive pay and its stance on shareholder rights.

ESG investing allows you to choose investments based on personal values and preferences, whether that’s looking after the planet, improving society or stamping out boardroom greed.

HOW ADVISERS ASSESS ESG SUITABILITY

As with any other investment, your adviser will talk to you about your goals, objectives and preferences for sectors to exclude or prioritise.

Mark Chicken, financial adviser at The Private Office, says: “Some investors take a light approach to ESG investing and just want to exclude, say, oil, gas and tobacco, whereas others prefer to target specific themes such as water or clean energy.”

As well as broad funds that include a wide range of companies aligning with certain principles, you can find more specialist funds targeting one theme. An example is Ninety One Global Environment, which only invests in companies contributing to the decarbonisation of the world economy.

Ido Eisenberg, head of responsible investing at Quilter, says: “‘Ethical investing’ means different things to different people. There is no right or wrong way to look at a company – it is down to your own values.

An alternative way to think about it is by asking which companies are managing their ESG risks well. Look for firms with genuinely diverse, independent boards; companies that measure their carbon impact and have credible plans to cut it; businesses that avoid harming the environment, and employers that treat their customers, workers and communities fairly. Those are the firms managing their risks – and your money – more responsibly, and ensuring their long-term viability as well as the planet’s.”

BALANCING ETHICS WITH RETURNS

While investors might like the idea of putting their money into companies that are working to look after the planet and society, the

‘I’M INVESTING IN SOCIETY’

For solicitor David, maximising returns is less important than backing companies that are making a positive impact. As he neared 60, he sought expert advice to allow him to do that effectively

David Hunter, a solicitor from Bristol, has been investing sustainably for several years. He feels passionately about committing to helping to protect the planet for the sake of generations to come.

David, 60, said he first dipped his toe in with a stocks and shares ISA from Triodos Bank.

He said: “The Triodos ISA was a good start. I knew my money was backing a range of pioneering businesses that are contributing to social and environmental change – from organic farms and wind farms to social housing projects and community centres.

“Anything that is having a bad impact on the environment and society, such as oil and gas companies, is a no-no.”

David Hunter has found ways to invest sustainably at a lower cost

As he approached his 60th birthday, David realised that he wanted some professional advice on accessing other ESG investments, as well as gaining more of an all-round picture of his finances.

“While I was happy with my sustainable ISA and some other investments I had made, I knew I could do with more structure to my financial affairs,” he says. “I also realised I didn’t know what I didn’t know about investing with this focus.

“I sought an adviser to help give me a serious financial plan on making sure my money was in the right places in terms of my principles, as well as being tax efficient. I needed a bigger picture view of my finances.”

Due to the myriad investment options in the marketplace, most people want to find a firm whose worldview aligns with theirs goal is also strong returns – and ESG investments won’t always offer the highest.

Since many ESG-focused strategies exclude certain sectors, they might miss out if, say, oil stocks go north. Financial adviser Chicken explains: “There’s some investment returns trade-off to be made with certain ESG portfolios.

But an adviser can strike the right balance for each client.”

Your adviser can talk you through the options for investing in ESG and together you can find the investments in areas you feel passionate about. Part of their job will also be to ensure you don’t fall foul of greenwashing.

This is where investment companies add ESG buzzwords such as “sustainable” or “responsible” to a fund’s name to increase its marketing appeal.

INVESTING IN THE RIGHT VALUES

To clamp down on this, in 2024 the Financial Conduct Authority introduced four investment labels that categorise funds based on specific goals: Sustainability Focus, Sustainability Improvers, Sustainability Impact, and Sustainability Mixed Goals.

Mark Chicken adds: “The benefit of having an adviser who specialises in ESG investment is that they will be well versed in the selection of investments that are right for each individual.”

MILESTONE PLANNING

At key life moments, financial advice can be crucial. Here’s when money management really matters

Working with a professional adviser can sharpen your focus on financial goals, but they will also help you prepare for the unexpected.

No matter how carefully you plot a roadmap, life seldom follows the trajectory you expect. Often priorities shift and your finances need to adapt accordingly.

“At these vulnerable moments in life, clients need to know how they can ensure their family is well looked after,” says Ola Abdul, founder and CEO of investment platform Fundment, which is used by advisers to help manage their clients’ investments.

“Speed and certainty matter when it comes to major family decisions, as any delays can erode trust in the advice given.”

These are the five key moments in life when you might want to seek financial advice.

1. STARTING A FAMILY

Having children can change your priorities overnight, and a good adviser will ensure that your financial plan keeps up. It can feel overwhelming to suddenly become responsible for feeding and housing another person, when you are used to only needing to take care of yourself.

Advisers are there to respond calmly and decisively when emotions are running high

Expenses increase at a time when household income will most likely fall due to one parent taking leave. Advice at this stage can help you think through scenarios you might not have considered, from putting in place insurance to protect your income and home, to investing for future costs such as university.

“Whether it’s saving into a junior ISA or buying protection-linked investments, an adviser can help make sure implications are properly understood and financial plans are well designed,” Abdul says.

2. BUYING A HOME

Getting on the property ladder brings a sense of security, particularly if you have navigated the challenges of the rental market. But it is also the biggest financial commitment you are likely to make.

A specialist adviser can guide you to save a deposit, find a mortgage that is affordable and make sure your credit file is in order ahead of your application. They will also highlight the importance of protecting your income to keep your home should the worst happen.

Abdul explains: “If you have investments to use towards a deposit, an adviser will help manage cashflow and timing. They will look at debts and assets together, not in isolation.”

3. CHANGING CAREERS

Switching jobs, retraining, relocating or taking time off to consider your options can all cause financial disruption. You might not be aware of the benefits you are losing when moving from one company to another or you might need to access investments to smooth the transition. “Career changes can bring uncertainty,” Abdul says. “But advisers increasingly act as financial stabilisers during those transitions, helping clients assess cashflow and make adjustments when the portfolio they had before is no longer right for that moment in life.”

4. PREPARING FOR RETIREMENT

As retirement approaches, investment strategies tend to shift from growing wealth to making sure that funds will last as long as they are needed. It is a complex process and timing is key. An adviser will help you manage risk, work out when to draw income and explain how to make the most of tax-free cash.

“Precision matters, to ensure that you do not run out of money in old age,” Abdul says. “Advisers help match drawdown plans to lifestyle and expected longevity, because no one knows how long they are going to be around.”

5. CARING FOR AGEING PARENTS

For the so-called “squeezed middle”, it can feel like financial demands are coming from all angles. Many families are providing handouts to children well into adulthood, whether that is to get a foot onto the housing ladder or get established in a career. At the same time older relatives might need help with care costs or managing their own finances.

Abdul says: “Advisers are there to respond calmly and decisively, helping families access funds, reallocate assets and get support in place when emotions are running high.”

Commitment to debt deserves specialist direction

When it comes to securing a mortgage, going it alone can be tempting, but expert input is invaluable to optimise your options

Leah Milner

Whether you are looking to buy your first home, take a step up the property ladder or refinance, securing the right mortgage is key. While it is possible to go it alone using online tools, seeking advice from a mortgage adviser could save you tens of thousands of pounds. Brokers can unlock deals that are not available to customers who apply directly, which could be the difference between landing your dream home and missing out. “A mortgage is probably the biggest outgoing you will ever have and the longest financial commitment, so it is not an area of life where you want to cut corners,” says Naomi Robinson, mortgage adviser at Naomi Financial in Holmfirth, near Huddersfield. “Getting it right can save so much money, stress and disappointment.” Comparison sites and mortgage calculators can be a useful starting point to get to grips with your finances and build confidence.

They will give you an idea of how much you could borrow, which is important when you begin house hunting and need to set a rough budget. But there are crucial factors they miss. You might pin your hopes on securing the lowest rate that appears in a comparison search, when in reality you do not meet that particular lender’s income requirements or they are not willing to offer you the amount you need.

Approaching your bank directly could also leave you short. “A recent client was told by their bank that they could only borrow £92,000, which put the house they wanted completely out of reach,” says Robinson. But experienced advisers know exactly which lenders will offer the most generous loan based on an individual borrower’s circumstances, while also ensuring that loan is going to be affordable.

“They were actually able to secure a mortgage for £142,000, putting the house back within their budget,” she says. “Just by having that conversation they went from deflated and disheartened to feeling really excited for their next chapter.” The example is far from a one-off. Robinson says she sees cases like this on a weekly basis.

Borrowers may find it difficult to determine the true cost of a mortgage deal without help from an expert. “A very low rate could look incredibly attractive,” Robinson says, “but it rarely tells the full story.” Mortgages can come with a host of additional charges, such as arrangement fees and exit penalties, as well as incentives like cashback or free valuations. Advisers calculate what a deal will actually cost over the fixed or discounted period, whether that is two years, five years or more. “That’s where advice from a broker adds real value,” says Robinson.

Selecting the right repayment term for your mortgage is another decision that should not be taken lightly. A mortgage adviser will explain that paying your loan back over 25 years will mean higher upfront costs, but a lower bill over the lifetime of the loan. Conversely, a longer repayment term of 35 years or more will keep your monthly costs down, but will mean you ultimately pay back more. An adviser will show how you can make adjustments to plan for the future. Keeley Macaulay, a mortgage and protection adviser at Mortgage 1st, who is based in Stockton-on-Tees near Middlesbrough, says: “Some borrowers might want to keep the repayment term long initially and then reduce it as they get older, if their salary increases.”

Applying directly for the cheapest deals you spot online is a risky strategy. All lenders have their own rules and restrictions on particular types of property, how long you have been employed, your credit history and other factors, many of which are not made public. But advisers have in-depth knowledge of different lenders’ criteria to help you target the ones with which you have the greatest chance of success. This is significant because multiple mortgage rejections can be damaging. “When you submit a full mortgage application, the lender will do a credit search and too many of those can impact your score,” says Macaulay. A lower credit score gives potential lenders less confidence in your ability to repay borrowing, further reducing your chances of landing a deal.

It can be a long road from finding a dream home to getting the keys

Over recent years, lenders have been repricing their products and updating their rules often and with little notice. “Interest rate changes and lending criteria changes have made it increasingly difficult for somebody to arrange their mortgage alone without an adviser,” says Robinson. Advisers keep on top of all the changes and are ready to adapt when needed. They can also switch borrowers on to cheaper rates if these become available before a mortgage completes.

Professional advisers will talk to their clients about the importance of life insurance, critical illness and income protection policies. “A mortgage is about buying a home, but protection is about keeping it,” Robinson says. “These policies can help families keep a roof over their heads if they suffer a serious illness, bereavement or loss of income.”

Technology is a great place to start your mortgage journey, the advisers say. But it is a long way from replacing their role. “Digital tools and comparison sites don’t step in if interest rates fall or a better deal becomes available,” Robinson says. “They can’t speak to lenders, chase solicitors, or talk to estate agents if issues arise.” It is hard to predict the stumbling blocks that can occur throughout the homebuying or remortgage process, but in times like these, it can be a real benefit to have an adviser fighting your corner.

Persistence pays

After being turned down for a mortgage, one young couple would have given up on their homeownership dream had their broker not urged them to try other lenders

Getting on to the housing ladder felt like a distant dream for Grace Buffery and Tom Robinson. But when the couple from Stafford realised that rising house prices could soon leave them priced out of homeownership altogether, they decided to seek advice from a mortgage broker just in case.

“We thought we were years away from buying,” says Tom, 25, who works at the University of Birmingham. “But rent was taking up so much of our income that we decided to look into whether it was feasible.”

Both had managed to save by working part-time jobs while they were students and together they had amassed a £49,000 deposit. However, they knew that they could not save enough each month to keep pace with rising house prices, particularly with rent increases eroding their income.

Despite having a healthy deposit, meeting lenders’ earnings requirements was another challenge. Grace, 23, is studying for a PhD and receives a quarterly stipend towards her living costs rather than a monthly salary. “Some of my colleagues warned me that because of this, there was no way I would get a mortgage,” she says.

But Tom’s brother recommended a broker, Naomi Robinson of Naomi Financial, who reassured the couple that there were lenders worth trying. In the meantime, she helped make sure they did everything necessary to get their finances and paperwork in order before applying for a mortgage.

“There were lots of little things we wouldn’t have thought of, like making sure our addresses matched across all accounts as we had moved a lot during our student years,” says Grace.

The couple found a Victorian terraced house in Stafford for £180,000, but the first lender they tried rejected the property after a valuation, because it was built with a single layer of bricks rather than a cavity wall.

“If it hadn’t been for Naomi, we would have just assumed that was the end of the story and given up hope of buying that house,” says Tom. “But she knew of other lenders we could try.”

The broker explains: “While mortgage advice often requires a great deal of problem-solving to find the right lender, I remain on hand throughout the process to provide guidance and support.”

Grace and Tom have now had their mortgage approved and are going through the final stages of property checks before their purchase completes. They are set to pay £726 per month for their mortgage, a saving of £74 compared to their current rent of £800. “Not only are we saving money each month, but we will be investing in something that we own instead of paying our landlord’s mortgage,” says Grace.

“We don’t know anyone else our age who has bought a home, so having Naomi’s help was really reassuring,” she adds. “She managed to explain everything so that we fully understood, but without being patronising.”

HOW THE EXPERTS MANAGE RISK

Before investing your money, advisers will look at your personal tolerance for exposure, consider a blend of active and passive funds, and weigh up ESG credentials

Leah Milner

For anyone new to investing, information overload can often lead to decision paralysis. “Doing nothing at all is the worst thing,” says Jennifer Armstrong, financial adviser at Medical & General Financial Solutions. She is used to meeting clients who are overwhelmed and helping them build a tailored plan for their money.

“The value of coming to a financial adviser is that we have a robust process with discipline behind it, which is repeatable,” she says. “So not everyone ends up with the same funds but they go through the same process.”

After answering questions, clients are then placed on a scale from one to ten, where ten is the highest tolerance for risk. But Armstrong will also discuss whether that level of risk feels appropriate for that particular investment. “People are happy to take different risks with different pots,” she says. “Someone might be more comfortable taking risks with an ISA than with their pension, or vice versa.”

She also talks through capacity for loss, or how a client would cope if markets fell, as well as the intended time horizon for the investment. “A lot of ISA money is for medium to long-term goals, like helping children with university, but some clients also want the flexibility to use that pot as extra income in retirement,” she says.

Once those foundations are set, Armstrong typically recommends a blend of active and passive funds.

Jennifer Armstrong, financial adviser at Medical & General Financial Solutions

“I’d love to reach a point where all funds are ethically governed, but we’re not there yet

“We do believe there is merit in some elements of active fund management,” she says, “but charges are important, particularly when someone is investing a relatively small amount.”

That is where funds such as BlackRock’s MyMap range can form part of the solution. MyMap is a range of actively managed, multi-asset funds that invest across a broad mix of assets including equities, bonds and alternatives, with different versions designed to suit different risk profiles. The funds are volatility managed, meaning the level of fluctuation in returns is kept within defined limits.

“If someone comes out as a five out of ten on the risk scale, I want to be confident that the fund they are invested in actually behaves like a five,” Armstrong says. The structure of the MyMap funds helps ensure portfolios do not drift into significantly higher or lower risk territory over time, while still offering broad geographic diversification. Armstrong points to strong independent ratings, competitive charges and solid long-term performance. The funds also include an active management overlay.

She also highlights the growing prominence of environmental, social and governance (ESG) factors for clients who want to make sure their investments align with their principles. The MyMap ESG option is one that Armstrong often uses in client portfolios. “I’d love to get to a point where we don’t even need to mention ESG because all funds are ethically and socially governed, but we are not there yet,” she says.

In the meantime, having ESG funds that perform in line with mainstream alternatives represents significant progress. “Years ago, if a client wanted an ESG fund, you would have had to warn them that it is probably not going to perform as well as others in that space, but there’s not that kind of penalty now,” Armstrong says.

How cover softens life’s hardest blows

Half of us don’t have personal insurance but experts say it has a vital role if redundancy, sickness or tragedy strike

Leah Milner

Millions of families have no protection in place to safeguard their home and income in the event of the death, illness or unemployment of one of the main earners. The Financial Conduct Authority has found that 58 per cent of UK households don’t hold a protection policy, even though many could benefit – and this is a gap that it’s urgently looking to close. “Financial planning is not just about building wealth. It’s about making sure the plan survives real life,” says Robyn Caffell, an Exeter-based financial planner at Intelligent Pensions. “Saving and investing help clients move towards their goals, but protection is what keeps those goals achievable when life doesn’t go to plan.” Protection products include life insurance, designed to pay out on death to help your loved ones; income protection, which replaces earnings if illness prevents you from working; and critical illness cover, which provides a lump sum following diagnosis of certain serious conditions. Using planning software, Caffell shows clients how vulnerable they could be in what-if scenarios. For example, she might demonstrate the impact of a sudden loss of income on a 48-year-old due to illness, when the mortgage and family lifestyle require funding for another 25 years. “Seeing that operation, his recovery took almost a year. “Because we had income protection in place, we could continue meeting our bills while he focused on rehabilitation. You’re often only truly grateful for protection when you actually need it.” Paul Barker, a senior financial planner at Fidelius in Bath, has witnessed how life insurance can give families time to adjust and grieve without the threat of losing their home. “One of my clients sadly lost her husband, but due to his life cover, she was able to take a year off from work to be with her children. It was an awful time, but made a little easier because they could afford to huddle together as a family and support one another.” Advisers say clients’ discomfort over thinking about traumatic events means that life insurance is often overlooked. “It involves situations that people hope will never happen to them,” Caffell says. She adds that many clients are more comfortable concentrating on investments, as they feel more positive and tangible. Cost is another barrier when clients are focused on their monthly outgoings, adds Barker. “One of the key junctures at which clients start to think about protection is when they have a lot of competing financial commitments, such as when they are buying a home or taking out a mortgage. I explain the cost of cover in the context of the value it provides – those extra pounds per month could provide total financial security.” Sometimes it takes an emotional trigger before clients understand where their vulnerabilities lie. “It can be something awful happening to a friend or family member that makes them reflect on their own position,” Barker says. Without protection, consequences can be severe. Caffell explains: “Cash reserves are used up, investments have to be accessed early, pension contributions stop, and retirement may need to be delayed for many years. A plan designed to last decades can start to fall within years or even months.” While bereavement, job loss or illness will inevitably take a huge emotional toll on those affected, protection can remove a layer of financial worry for those at their most vulnerable.

‘YOU THINK YOU’RE INVINCIBLE’

A devastating diagnosis left Mel and her husband wondering how they would cope. Then their critical illness plan came to the rescue – sorting bills, clearing the mortgage and paying for a Disney break with the kids

When mother of two Mel Adamson was told she had bowel cancer, it came as a complete shock. “As soon as you hear the C word, you go into panic mode,” says Mel, 50, a civil servant from Telford. “All you think about is your kids.” There were no obvious symptoms until Mel was left in excruciating pain one night in April 2023 after a takeaway, which prompted a trip to A&E. Further medical investigation – including blood tests and scans – followed. Then a colonoscopy revealed a cancerous tumour. On the drive back from the hospital, Mel and her husband Stuart agonised over what to say to their daughters, who were just 12 and 15 at the time. “In the end we decided to be completely honest and tell them it was cancer,” says Stuart, 55, also a civil servant. “We felt that they were old enough to understand. We wanted to show them that, as hard as it was, you can’t give up. It’s something you face and deal with together.”

During one of her hospital visits, Mel was given a pamphlet from Macmillan Cancer Support, which reminded the couple to check if they had insurance. With all the stress of the diagnosis, Mel and Stuart had forgotten the critical illness policy they had taken out years earlier with their mortgage. They called their financial adviser Claire Dentith, of Shropshire-based CD Financial. She put the wheels in motion for their claim, while they focused all their attention on Mel’s treatment. After surgery to remove the tumour in August 2023, doctors confirmed the cancer had been caught relatively early, at stage two, and chemotherapy wasn’t needed. Even so, cancer turned their lives upside down. “I had five months off work, for the surgery and then for the physical and psychological recovery,” remembers Mel. She got sick pay during this time, so the couple’s outgoings were covered in the short term. But their mortgage deal was coming to an end the following year and they were likely to face a big jump in payments. When their insurance policy paid out it was enough to clear their mortgage completely. It also meant they could treat the girls to a trip to Walt Disney World in Florida to make positive memories together after such a difficult period in their lives. Looking back, the Adamsons are so grateful that their financial adviser encouraged them to take out the cover. Stuart says: “You think you’re invincible, until the day you discover that you’re not. The peace of mind that cover gives you is priceless.” For Claire Dentith, real-life experiences such as Mel’s help bring home the importance of protection when speaking to her clients. It’s also rewarding to see the benefits good financial planning can provide. She says: “After everything that Mel and Stuart have been through, it’s great to see them now living mortgage free and enjoying life with their daughters.”

THE GUIDE'S MISSION

As households continue to adjust to higher mortgage costs, rising living expenses and long-term retirement pressures, financial decisions have rarely felt more significant.

For many people, the question is not whether financial advice would be valuable, but how to find an adviser they can trust.

The VouchedFor 2026 Top Rated Financial Adviser Guide makes that decision clearer.

VouchedFor was founded to bring greater transparency to financial advice. In 2025, our consumer site had 278,799 active users and 1.85 million page views. And with 411,180 verified reviews, it offers insight into real client experiences.

In 2026, 2,784 advisers have qualified as Top Rated. To be included in this guide, advisers must receive a minimum number of recent client reviews, maintain consistently high ratings, hold the appropriate regulatory permissions and remain fully verified members of VouchedFor.

However, the importance of the guide goes beyond simply recognition.

Across our platform in the past 12 months:

- 98.9 per cent of clients said they would recommend their adviser.

HOW TO USE THE GUIDE

The Top Rated Financial Adviser Guide showcases advisers who have achieved Top Rated status through verified client feedback. All advisers included in this guide have a paid-for public profile on VouchedFor, and have demonstrated consistent, high-quality service. However, identifying the right one for you will depend on your needs, goals and preferences.

Here are six tips to help you choose:

1 UNDERSTAND DIFFERENT ADVISER TYPES

Some advisers specialise in pensions and retirement planning. Others focus on mortgages, protection, investments or holistic financial planning. Look at what services each one offers and whether they match what you are looking for.

2 READ CLIENT REVIEWS CAREFULLY

Reviews not only tell you whether or not clients are happy: they also show you why. Look for comments about clarity around fees, understanding of risk, confidence in achieving goals and ongoing communication. If you see language that resonates with your own priorities, that is a strong signal that the adviser will be a good match.

3 LOOK FOR CONSISTENCY

One positive review is encouraging. Dozens of consistent reviews over time is powerful. Top Rated advisers maintain strong feedback year after year, not just once.

4 CHECK EXPERIENCE AND QUALIFICATIONS

Financial advice is regulated in the UK, and you can be confident that every adviser in this guide is authorised and verified. To view their professional qualifications, areas of specialism and years in practice, check their VouchedFor profile.

5 CONSIDER LOCATION – BUT DON'T BE LIMITED BY IT

Many advisers now work via video and phone meetings. If you prefer face-to-face advice, you will probably want to choose someone local, but being flexible about how you talk to your adviser will open up more options.

6 ARRANGE A CONVERSATION BEFORE CHOOSING

Most advisers offer an initial consultation. Use it to explain your goals, ask about fees, understand how they are paid and get a feel for whether you will be comfortable working together. Trust and clarity are key.

If you need help, visit VouchedFor.co.uk to explore full adviser profiles, read more reviews and compare options. Choosing financial advice should not feel like guesswork. With transparent client feedback and clear information, you can make your decision with confidence.

Top Rated Firms help people plan ahead with confidence

These financial advice businesses use client feedback to help stay ahead of the pack

Choosing a financial adviser is one of the most important economic decisions many people will make. It can shape retirement plans, family security and long-term confidence. This year, 167 companies across the UK have achieved the status of Top Rated Firm. This increase on last year is testament to the fact that more businesses have adopted a structured and transparent approach to client feedback. All Top Rated Firms pay an Elevation membership fee, reflecting a shared conviction that systematically gathering and acting on customer feedback is central to delivering consistently high standards of advice, service and value. To qualify, firms must invite all clients to provide feedback, and show an ongoing commitment to listening and responding to it. They are required to maintain high ratings alongside strong and sustained consumer engagement. Top Rated status is grounded in verified customer feedback. Clients are asked whether they understand the fees they are paying, if they feel clear about the risks involved and whether they are confident that they're on track to achieve their goals. Top Rated status indicates a reassuring level of openness. It offers insight not just into what a firm says about itself, but what its clients actually experience. Rachel Duncalf, people and operations manager at Forrester Boyd Wealth Management, says: "This isn't just about reviews. It's about proving – to ourselves, to clients and to future colleagues – that the experience we deliver stands up to scrutiny." Financial advice can feel complex. Charges are not always easy to compare, and investment risk is not always straightforward to understand. The businesses recognised as Top Rated in the 2026 guide have demonstrated that their clients feel informed, understood and confident. Behind each rating is a real story. A couple planning retirement. A family protecting their income. A business owner preparing for succession. The number of firms achieving Top Rated status continues to grow year-on-year. This demonstrates a broader shift towards measurable client outcomes and a welcome increase in transparency. For anyone who is searching for financial advice, recognition grounded in verified client feedback offers a simple signal – these are companies whose clients are prepared to stand behind them.
